

How would we survive without religious freedom? Without it, our world would be very different from what it is now. Religious freedom is of utmost importance because it creates peace, promotes fair treatment of all people, and creates a balanced government.

Religious freedom creates peace in the world by reducing judging and discrimination against people of different religions. There are no longer any large wars over religions such as the crusades. Religious freedom helps strengthen bonds between different groups of people. It also creates greater diversity in nations as there is not an official religion that everyone must follow.

Religious freedom creates a more balanced government as it is not run by religion. In a perfect non-theocratic government, the leader is not at all influenced by his or her religion. This makes their decisions unbiased and fair.

Religious freedom creates equality for all people. Religions are usually not considered in job applications or any elected position. Although there are many stereotypes regarding certain religious groups, most people are accepting of other religions.

In conclusion, religious freedom makes for a better world and better treatment of people. It creates peace, promotes fair treatment of all people, and creates a more balanced government. If we did not have religious freedom, the world would be much a much more strict place and would lack diversity. This is why religious freedom is so important.
